Not sadder am I for the waking.
Out of these beautiful dreams.
Not tearful, because there are shadows.
Or murmurs in wandering streams.
But wiser, and happier in knowing.
That real and earnest is life.
And the soul will grow betier and purer.
By entering into the strife.

I could not, with idle hands folded see the bending harvest stand, waiting for willing reapers. And not give a helping hand; I could not lorget in the reaping. And selfishly gather flowers. That side by side with the golden grain has been nursed by the sun and showers, But hold in my arms, as I bind them (Not flowers, alone, or leaves.) But thistles, and thorns and roses With ripened grain, make the sheaves.

Ah, happy the spring-time, and seed time, When we dream of what is to be, Yet, happier the harvest, for wiser And stronger, and trusting are we. Ah, sweet is our youth and our childhood. For careless and happy we dream. Of life as the lark whe, undainted. Soars up in the suns bright beam.

But sweeter and desirer and calmer, When softly the pulse throbs and slow. When the dreams at d the watting is over And the spirit is willing to go, Yet, sweeter than all will be rest, when the spirit will softly glide, but of the shadowy cloud-land here,
